ACKNOWLEDGEMENT

This thesis is dedicated to all those who surrounded me and supported me in various means throughout this long journey. Without this valuable support and encouragement, I would not been able to complete this long journey.

Thanks are insufficient to acknowledge my thesis supervisor Dr. Pinkaew Luangaramsri. You accepted to supervise my thesis, pointing out aspects, which I did not realize, patiently read my manuscript and field notes and never gave on up a student like me who became a young mother, believing that I would not run away. I owe you intellectual debt, your moral support and understanding my academic journey and the challenges as a young scholar. My next debt is to Dr. Yos Santasombat, my mentor, who always challenges me to think differently and act accordingly. Thanks to Dr. Apinya Fuengfusakul for helping me shape my research proposal and Dr. Shirley Worland for giving me methodological clues to transform my empirical data into linking with my research proposal. Ajarn Ekkamol's, thank you for bringing me to Regional Center for Social Science (Development Tract) RCSD. You are amazing person I have known who is so kind and understanding with a great generosity, humor and patience. You have shown me what a better human being is. All my lecturers and classmates' open mindedness and discussion provoked my desire to build up this study and narrow down into practice.

Intellectual debts go to Dr. Chris Littleton as part of my thesis committee for commenting critically and pointing out insightful anthropological aspects on bride price and dowry that I did not encounter in earlier literature. I have learned a lot about ethnicity studies from Dr. Mukdawan Sakboon - in your lectures and your comments on the Burmanization part in this thesis. I have tried to revise my thesis based on my committee's comments at my best. If my revision had not been met, that is the risk that I have taken and all the damage of the argument and presentation due on me.

I owe a great deal of intellectual and moral debts to Dr. Lian Hmung Sakhong and the late Bianca Suantak on a better understanding of the dynamism of Chin's history, politics and its cultural continuity that have inspired my early interest in Chin ethnicity the most. Professor Michael Gravers was kind enough to unconditionally read my manuscript and encourage me to extend this study. I am the most grateful for your questions, comments and encouragement. I owe a colossal debt to you.

My time in the field was a collaborative effort at its best. Thanks to my hosts and their neighbors who did not know my name and background but assisted me in my medical crisis during my first field visit. Special thanks go to Rachel Fleming for taking care of me as a heavily pregnant woman as well as sharing empirical information from your field observation. I owe a debt to Father Paul Htun Khine from Roman Catholic Church for welcoming me to stay at a nunnery and allowing me to share their meal and their everyday experiences. My gratitude also especially goes to Sister Aye Hla and Mang Ling from whom I learned so much. Your interpretation and the discussion I had with you shaped my study in many ways. My deep inspiration goes to U Hoih Pa for his collection and record of Khumi culture in text from oral culture. His authoring books and resources and giving me time for further explanation is indeed a need of my study. I am grateful to all Chin groups who welcomed me with a courtesy and warmth I shall always remember. I am certain that many of my friends in Paletwa would prefer to remain anonymous. My gratitude also goes to Steven Ni Kio in Yangon who gave me time to explain “the Chin marriage and its payments”.

Sena Galazzi Lian did a lot more than just edit my draft. She repaired a great deal of the damage and confusion caused by my grammar, reorganized my presentation and sharpened my focus especially on chapter 5. Also thanks to Vicci Tallis who never said no to editing, comments and questions. I am so lucky to know you. Your feminist thoughts give me an inspiration to explore beyond this study.

I also thanks to all Regional Center for Social Science (RCSD) staffs for their professional and friendly support throughout my long study. A special word of thanks is due to Pi Ann and Pi Pong for a constant stream of support and care.

I would like to extend my thanks to Heinrich Boell Foundation (HBF) for granting me a scholarship. Special thanks go to Rainer who never hesitates to facilitate and address any problems at different stage during my course work. And also a friendly support of Florian shall be never forgotten.

Lastly, but not least, the encouragement, taking care of our little Manglian when writing my dissertation, intellectual companion and moral support of my husband, Friedor throughout this long academic journey was the most important need. You are my first reader and commentator and you deserve the most with my study. Without this, my study will surely still remain in a dream. To my parents and parents in law, go my deepest appreciation for their love, care and moral support. Manglian, you are the most important person who is so patient with me.
